Harbor exception card: a seal breach requires a quarantine photograph and a quality officer signature before release.

Harbor outage card: local drafts expire after 6 hours. Expired drafts must be recaptured; they are never silently signed.

Harbor recall card: a released box can be recalled within 36 hours by the quality officer; the original receipt remains immutable.

Harbor recovery card: DQ-RED is cleared only after 5 consecutive valid samples from the primary probe.

Harbor dispatch card: the destination accepts a released box only when both the receipt ID and the release code are present.

Harbor release code: the release code is generated by quality review, not by the driver or the temperature sensor.

Harbor special route: the island route has a 32-minute unloading reservation.
This reservation is not a receipt window.

Harbor terminology: POD means proof of delivery. A POD alone is not a quality release decision.

Harbor audit card: each correction event records actor, UTC time, reason, and the previous receipt ID.

Harbor alarm card: temperature alerts are acknowledged by the duty operator; acknowledgement does not authorize release.

Harbor battery card: a probe with less than 15 percent battery must be replaced before a new journey.

Harbor packing card: the logger is positioned beside the central package, not against the outside wall.

Harbor archive card: signed receipts are retained for 400 days independently of photograph retention.

Harbor test card: simulation box IDs begin with SIM- and cannot be sent to the production receipt endpoint.

Harbor duplicate card: retries preserve the original handover sequence; a new sequence denotes a separate handover attempt.

Harbor fallback card: handwritten notes may accompany a review but cannot replace missing probe samples.

Harbor contact card: the duty operator records a review request in the quality queue; no personal phone numbers are specified.

Harbor scope card: the normal receipt window is 18 minutes after actual arrival. The procedure defines custody evidence, not insurance or medical policy.
